Work Has Been Rushed Night and Day to Accomplish This Result—

Description of the Building.

No one not familiar with the rapidity with which work can be done under pressure would have believed, from a visit to the Lafayette Square Opera House early in the week, it possible that the building could be finished so as to be opened to the public next Monday night. There were no usual piles of rubbish in front of the building, including boards which had constituted the scaffolding, terra cotta pipes, bricks and pieces of stone and the litter that is always made by building material. Inside, though the scaffolding had been taken down, there was painful evidence of incompleteness. The iron grooves in which the scenery is to run were just being put into the walls on the stage, and on that part of the building everything looked bare and desolate.

In the auditorium some of the chairs had been put into the orchestra, but all around the lower floor workmen were busy putting the kalsomining on the walls, while in the balcony and galleries similar work was being carried on. There were no balusters to the broad stairs that lead from the lobby to the balcony above, and the private boxes were only indicated by upright pieces of scaffolding. The front of the stage was unfinished, and the handsome doors had not yet arrived. Had every contractor kept his word, the building would have been ready to receive the orchestra, and the orchestra would have been ready to receive the audience.

In the midst of all this confusion, seated in a big arm chair in one of the orchestra aisles, was Mr. John W. Albright, to whom the progress of all this work was being around him meant so much. He had been compelled to postpone the opening of this opera house, of which he is not only to be the manager, but also the financial manager, until the building was ready to receive the orchestra, and the orchestra would have been ready to receive the audience.

He had been kept at the work by constant and vigorous supervision. He has had to be on the ground for several weeks past, pushing the contractors, some of whom have been very negligent.
